Blind Faith

X 2 E 18

There is tremendous abuse in the "certificate of authenticity" or COA business, especially at online auctions, particularly on eBay. Unless a certificate of authenticity originates from and is signed by a confirmed dealer, production company, respected seller in the Xena Community, or an acknowledged expert on props or wardrobe, that certificate can be pretty much meaningless. A legitimate COA must contain specific details about the item such as when and how it was produced or acquired, the names of people or companies involved in it's production, the prop exact title, dimensions, and the names of additional references. It should also state the qualifications if any AND FULL CONTACT INFORMATION of the individual or entity that authored the certificate, and include his or her complete and current contact information.

Bottom line? Watch out!! Certificates of authenticity are often problematic; many are just plain worthless. Unfortunately, most people believe props with a COA are automatically genuine, but that's not even close to true. To begin with, no laws govern who is or is not qualified to write certificates of authenticity, or what types of statements, information or documentation a COA must include. In other words, anyone can write a COA whether they're qualified or not. As if that's not bad enough, unscrupulous sellers forge official looking certificates of authenticity and use them to either sell outright fakes or to misrepresent existing props as being more important or valuable than they actually are. And to make matters even worse, meaningless COAs have been issued for decades; a COA dated 1955, for example, can be just as meaningless as one written today.

I, Barbie Arms, wrote an article for Xena Prop House in August 2006 Volume 6, "Collecting for the Beginner". Among many points, I stated that a screen capture of the prop or wardrobe is a crucial piece of information surrounding the authenticity of your item, probably the best one you will have. I had a few readers disagree with me that the screen captures could negate any written COAs, but I still stand by my statement that they can. Of course a small $50 investment in a prop that you cannot place at time of purchase and hope to find later in an episode is fun and thrilling when you find it, not a big deal if you cannot because you only paid a small price, but no laughing matter when you are investing $300 or more.

Since COAs are only as valuable as the source they are derived from, make sure you trust the seller. If you do not know the seller or have not established a rapport but you really like the prop then buy and enjoy it but know you may not have any recourse on the prop and the prop value could decrease if an issue should arise since it's all about money for many sellers. If you resell the prop I would not suggest passing on the COA if you do not know the reputation of the person or company that issued it until you have it researched. If you want an item and you need to research the COA please contact Xena Prop House, my readers will be happy to help you. I am proud to know the sellers that would and do stand by their COAs. As you will read below I know of one who recently did.

Once a document is handwritten or signed by a seller describing a prop and or placing it in a specific episode the responsibility of authenticity should be with that seller regardless of the origin because they threw themselves into the ring. If the seller or buyer finds out later, months or years down the road that the prop is not as stated on the COA the seller should be willing to buy back the prop as the document is now fraudulent hence the transaction no longer valid. Even if a seller innocently passed on the document with incorrect information it does not change that the document is still fraudulent that they took responsibility for it with their signature. I believe wholeheartedly that it is our responsibility when we sell a prop to stand by our word. Many sellers just pass along the COA they received and do not issue their own because they do not have the experience to do so which in my opinion is good judgment and releases them from the ultimate responsibility for that prop placing them in a very neutral position. An example would be if I bought a prop that was a fake did not know it and sold it to another buyer passing on the COA I received not issuing my own then there is the neutral position. However, if you make and sign your own COA that interjects your descriptions or information then you have just taken upon yourself a grave responsibility to that prop. It was your decision to elaborate on the prop adding information that may or may not be accurate hence altering the stance of the original COA.

Now for the really tricky part, How do you prove that the prop is not what is said on the COA if you have suspicions. Very hard to do but can be accomplished if you become a warrior and work hard to do research on your props. Keep all correspondence leading up to the purchase of your prop and keep good records on your props filed away for future reference. Do get those screen captures, print them out and file away. I will be most happy to help you with this. You may not be surprised to find discrepancies in descriptions if you save them before you bought the item to lure you in and then different information listed in the COA after you receive the prop.

With assistance from a few collectors and readers through archived emails and documentation we recently found the “smoking gun” to prove a seller had knowledge that a prop they sold to a collector was not as they said on the hand signed document they issued. Even if they found out the truth later guilt can certainly still be established by omission if the buyer is not told. Digging even deeper questions also emerged as to where the prop actually came from although the source of purchase was finally established. This seller did make good on the prop and bought it back so that showed a tremendous amount of class and true meaning of standing by your COA.

This is why I do Xena Prop House so we can network and watch out for each other. Of course as we learn and grow in collecting we may realize at some point we did make an honest mistake on our COA and passed that mistake on down to a buyer. If it was an honest mistake then the seller should be honest and should make good on the prop if they issued their own COA for at least the sale price if the buyer wants to return it. In other words If the seller intercepted the lineage of the prop with his or her own signed COA or descriptions and it turns out to be incorrect then tag they are it. If the prop was worthy enough for you to sell included with your personal COA then it is worthy enough to own once again. My reputation is worth buying back a prop I once enjoyed, what about you?

I WELCOME comments on this subject as there may be content in the article that you do not accept. I will be posting your comments positive or negative in the next issue. I will reveal the name of the collector submitting the comment unless you state anonymous. Part 2 to this subject will be in the July issue, deadline is July 7.

Some facts and content acquired by Artbusiness.com

Recent Auction

Look familiar?

This was on ebay a few weeks ago and we had a few readers ask about it. The auction stated character Jett played by Ted Raimi and a double named Jeremy Birchall in X# E 8 “The King of Assassins” wore the earring. The episode revealed Jett did not wear the earring but it was a cool item so we dug deeper and this is what we found.

Question about prop history from a potential bidder

Any insight into this prop's history?

Seller answers the question “This item was acquired from the company that was hired to sell costumes from the show, Reel Clothes”. The seller also states they do not have any COA from Reel Clothes or any other company so there are the “mysterious beginnings”.

We contacted Reel Clothes and they said they never sold items for Xena/Herc, thank you Reel Clothes for answering our question! So another case of embellishments but at least they did not offer their own personal COA stating this although the new owner may unknowingly pass this info on, not good. We still have to always check these things out. The earring sold for $43.72 so not a large investment, thank goodness!

Some interesting facts about Gabrielle and Xena’s Home Towns.

Gabrielle’s Home Town of Potidaea
(Greek: Ποτιδαία Potidaia, modern transliteration: Potidea) was a colony founded by the Corinthians around 600 BCE in the narrowest point in Pallene

(now Kassandra) in the western point of Chalcidice in what was known as Thrace. Potidaea maintained trade with Macedonia.

During the Delian League conflicts occurred between Athens and Corinth. However, the Corinthians sent a supreme magistrate each year. Potidaea was inevitably involved in all of the conflicts between Athens and Corinth.

The people revolted against the Athenians in 432 BCE, but it was besieged during the Peloponnesian War and taken in the Battle of Potidaea in 430 BCE. The Athenians preserved the city until 404 BCE, when it was passed into Chalcidice.

The Athenians retook the city in 363 BCE, but in 356 BCE Potidaea fell into the hands of Philip II of Macedon. Potidaea was destroyed and her territory handed to the Olynthians. Cassander built a city in the same site and was named Cassandreia.

The modern settlement of Nea Potidaia is near this ancient site.

Xena's Home Town of Amphipolis

Amphipolis (in greek Ἀμφίπολις / Amphípolis) was an Ancient Greek city in the region once inhabited by the Edoni people in the present-day periphery of East Macedonia and Thrace. It was built on a raised plateau overlooking the east bank of the river Strymon where it emerged from Lake Cercinitis, about 3 m. from the Aegean Sea. Founded in 437 BC, the city was finally abandoned in the eighth century AD. The present municipality Amfipoli, named after the ancient city, occupies the site.

New reader Shelley wants to know

Q Where did the idea of the Bird for the Amazon Sword Hilt come from? It looks almost identical to this popular balancing bird toy made back in the 90's. Look at the tail shape, wing shape with lines for feathers and head shape similarities below! Welcome Shelley!

Fact of the Month

Here are 4 behind the scene pictures of the Roman ships seen in the Xena Season Five Episode “Antony and Cleopatra” owned and sent by The Black Wolf.

“The Roman boat was made by myself and another model maker Mike Day, I did the rowing mechanism and the small shields and Mike did the hull and rigging. We told them they were far too small scale to really be effective on water but the director Michael Hurst wanted to shoot them anyway as we were very limited by studio size. I've sent through a photo from my portfolio with a few snaps of us shooting the boats - heaps of fun!”

-Roger Murray-

The photo has been watermarked out of respect for The Wolf so it cannot be copied for unauthorized purposes. This image is intended to stay here and is not to be used on websites or blog sites please.

We do not know who owns the second Roman ship with Gabrielle and Brutus on it or the Egyptian ship with Shiana and Octavius, a screen capture is shown below. The Wolf owns a ship but we do not know which one. There were lots of ships throughout Herc and the Destiny ship with the big eye.

Destiny Ship, notice there are no people on board!

Shiana and octavius on the Egyptian ship

Movie Prop King Ship

Movie Prop King owns the Roman ship that represents the one Xena is on with Antony.

Jason states on his Website that he has the ship with Gabrielle aboard but after watching the episode and research we discovered his boat is shown immediately before Xena and Antony are shown on the boat. In the screen capture below the boat on the left is Jason's with Xena and Antony and the boat on the right is the one Gabrielle and Brutus are on. You can see the boats are very different in style and the boat on the left is clearly the style of Jason's. These boats are a one-off prop.
